

Foundery Band Lists 1742–1746 compiled by Randy L. Maddox

Band meetings were perhaps the most significant structure of the Wesleyan Methodist revival in its earliest days.¹ These small-group gathering for mutual spiritual support (in which men were separate from women, and married persons from single) were inherited from the Moravians. John Wesley was introduced to this structure most directly when a religious society was organized on May 1, 1738 in Fetter Lane, London. While the founding members of this society were all communicants in the Church of England, it was developed along Moravian lines through the advice of Peter Böhler, as reflected in the rules adopted for the group over the coming weeks. The most reliable record of these developments as they unfolded are the manuscript minutes in the Archives of the United Brethren in Herrnhut, Germany.² These can be compared with Wesley’s record in his second published extract of his Journal (issued in 1740), which reduces the list of rules a bit and presents them in a way that might mislead readers to assume they were adopted in whole at the first meeting;³ and with the record mediated by James Hutton, which adds some rules not found in either the Herrnhut minutes or Wesley’s Journal account.⁴ And all of these differ some from the list of rules (reduced in number but with an expansion of questions asked in meetings) that Wesley was treating as normative by December 25, 1738 among his followers.⁵ Disagreement over some spiritual emphases of the Moravians led John and Charles Wesley, and several followers, to part ways with the Fetter Lane society in the spring of 1740.⁶ Whatever their other differences, the Wesleyan wing of this divide carried over the practice of meeting in bands to the Foundery in London, a building John had recently leased for their use.

While band meetings were the foundational or entry-level structure of religious support and accountability in the earliest Wesleyan movement, they were displaced from this role through the mid-1740s by “class meetings.” Class meetings were initially set up in Bristol, in February 1742, as a means of organizing financial contributions from members.⁷ But their distinctive structure, which included class-leaders visiting homes, where they could provide pastoral advice, proved of “unspeakable usefulness”—leading Wesley to adopt the structure elsewhere, beginning just a month later in London, home to the largest group of his followers.⁸ The chronological priority of band meetings, as well as some shift in their focus after class meetings emerged, has often been missed because when Wesley published A Plain Account of the People called Methodists in 1749, he presented class meetings before band meetings, reflecting how Methodists now experienced the two forms.⁹

The purpose of the present resource is not to explore in detail the structure of a band meeting, or the differences between it and class meetings. Their distinction has been presented to clarify the contents distilled below of one of John Wesley's manuscript notebooks that survive in the holdings of the Methodist Archives Research Centre at The John Rylands Library of the University of Manchester.¹⁰ This notebook contains several lists in John Wesley's hand of the membership of the bands associated with the Foundry in London between April 1742 and June 1746 (hence, it is hereafter called "Foundry Band Lists").¹¹

The first thing to note about these lists is that they are largely restricted to the bands, even though class meetings were present at the time in London, functioning as the entry-level into the Methodist society. This is clear in a letter of Abraham Jones to John Wesley on December 12, 1742.¹² In the letter Jones (a class leader) reports to Wesley the spiritual status and behavior of some fellow Methodists. He identifies the persons as "in my class," and most of the names he gives never appear in Foundry Band Lists. Among persons he mentions are both men and women, consistent with the fact that classes, unlike bands, did not separate members by sex. Furthermore, Jones reports that one of the women in his class had been present the evening Wesley "met the bands" before he left town.¹³ Members of bands were also expected to be part of a class, as reflected in this case. But not all class members were in a band (indeed, Abraham Jones's name does not appear in a list of a band for married men until Jan. 1744). If John Wesley kept lists of every class in London in these early years, parallel to the Foundry Band Lists, it is not known to survive.

The manuscript notebook we are considering includes lists of bands on twelve discreet dates, all during or anticipating one of Wesley's periods of ministry in London. There is no index or summative list. Indeed, my initial purpose for preparing this document was to provide a full list, to assist in identifying persons mentioned in the letters, diaries, and journals of John Wesley. Rather than transcribing each discrete list and then indexing, I decided to compile an alphabetical listing of all names, and use columns to indicate the various lists on which a name appeared (using the page number where the name appears in the column as the indicator).

Wesley's spelling of names in this notebook is fairly consistent and in most cases clear; in instances where spelling varies but the same person is clearly in view, I have standardized to the most ⁹Class meetings are described in section II of Plain Account (Works, 9:260–64), while band meetings are reserved for section VI (266–68). common spelling (including consulting mentions in John’s letters and journal). Wesley used a standard set of shortened forms of first names in these lists, which I have silently expanded.¹⁴ A bit more challenging were instances where the same name appears more than once in lists of the same date. In many cases these duplications appear to be of a parent and child, as one appears in a married list and the other a single list, and both are included below identified accordingly. In a couple of cases (like Elizabeth Edwards) the duplication is consistent enough over lists of different dates that it became clear two distinct persons (both single) were intended, and I include listings for both. But on a few occasions it appears the person may have been in one band and then moved to another; I have not included an entry for a distinct second person in such ambiguous cases.

Some biographical information about the persons listed is embedded in the Foundery Band Lists. There were separate bands for male and female, as well as division within each sex of single from married.¹⁵ This helps clarify the sex of a few ambiguous first names like “Christian.” But one area of ambiguity remains. There is no separate grouping for widows or widowers. Moreover it was common in the eighteenth century to call older single women (those beyond likelihood of marriage) “Mrs.” One or both of these factors may help explain why in the November 1745 set of lists several women with quite distinctive names appear for the first time in bands for single women, having appeared on prior dates in lists for married women (i.e., widows or “spinsters” being reclassified as single).

In addition to listing names, Wesley added scattered comments about individuals (most often in the shorthand he learned from John Byrom). Some of these comments are biographical, noting for example their death or marriage. These are included in the chart below with the shorthand expanded and placed with [[square brackets]] (as an indicator it appears in shorthand). But many of Wesley’s shorthand comments regard a person’s spiritual state or behavior—recording, for example, that they are angry, or slack, or slandered another member of the society. I have not included expansions of these characterizations in the chart.

As I worked with Foundery Band Lists, I was drawn to traces of the evolution of early Methodist structures which will be of interest to some scholars. For example, the initial rules for the bands required new persons desiring to join a band to serve a period of time “on trial” before they were granted full status.¹⁶ Trial status appears in three distinct forms in the lists in this notebook: 1) Beginning with the earliest set of lists (April 1742) there are some bands specifically labeled “on trial.”¹⁷ Each of these trial bands has a leader (name appearing vertically alongside the list), who also appears in full standing within a regular band, and who served as mentor to the group. Not all persons listed in a trial band on one date advanced to a regular band in the next set of lists. Some were apparently dropped, disappearing from future lists. 2) From the earliest set of lists there are also instances of persons whose name appears in a regular band list, followed by Wesley’s annotation “tr.”¹⁸ This annotation almost certainly indicates “on trial.” In some instances the person had been in a trial band previously, and was possibly moved rather tentatively into a regular band. But in other instances the person had appeared previously in a regular band without such annotation, suggesting a concern had emerged that moved them back into trial status. 3) This later possibility becomes most explicit in the lists for January 1744. Here appears for the first (and only) time a set of band lists labeled “second trial.”¹⁹ A few of the names in the “second trial” bands appeared in previous lists only in a trial band, often for multiple dates showing a prolonged trial period (e.g. Birch Balckumb). But most persons appearing in the “second trial” band had appeared previously in regular bands—some were designated in their most recent prior listing as “on trial” (e.g., Ann Carpenter), and several had a period of lapse in band membership before appearing in this group (e.g., Hannah Boatswain, Mary Branch). There are only four lists for those on “second trial” (divided by sex and marital status) and no leader is named. Wesley may have met with these bands himself, as the largest portion of his shorthand comments about a person’s spiritual state or behavior appear in these four lists. Many of the names are also ~~struck through~~;²⁰ in many such cases the person disappears from future lists, but in a few cases they appear to have succeeded in their second trial, since they appear subsequently in regular bands.

¹⁵These divisions are captured in the chart below in the first column after the name—which identifies each person as sf (single female), mf (married female), sm (single male), or mm (married male).

¹⁶JW’s Journal version specified at least two months on trial, Works, 18:236.

¹⁷When a person’s name appears in an “on trial” band, this is indicated by adding “tb” after the page number in the relevant column.

The most significant thing to note about both “on trial” bands and “second trial” bands in the Foundry Band Lists is that after January 1744 they disappear from listings. A few instances continue of persons in a regular band being marked on trial status (“tr”), but no separate bands. A major reason for this was class meetings had become standard by then, which were designed for and usurped the role of providing supervision of those newly entering Methodist societies. But the disappearance of trial bands was also due to the emergence of a new type of band. In the January 1744 lists of the regular bands Wesley added after a few names a “p,” which almost certainly stood for penitent.²¹ Penitents were persons who had been a band member in good standing, but stopped attending or had been put out for violations of the General Rules, and were now seeking readmission in full standing. We know from other records that the category of “penitent” was in place by August 1743, and that they gathered at times as a group.²² Starting in July 1744 such persons were listed in distinct bands labeled for “penitents.”²³ With the emergence of penitent bands, “second trial” bands lost any purpose and disappeared along with trial bands (indeed, the “second trial” bands could be viewed as the earliest form of bands for penitents).

One of the most central principles of John Wesley’s approach to spiritual formation was the need of discipline, including accountability. Class leaders were charged with providing accountability for those in their class,²⁴ and the same was surely expected of the leaders of the trial bands. In contrast with the model he experienced at Fetter Lane, Wesley initially envisioned accountability within a regular band as mutual in nature.²⁵ The Foundry Band Lists suggest that by 1742 Wesley was discerning the need for a ¹⁹When a name appears in a “second trial” band, this is indicated by adding “2tr” after the page number in the relevant column.

²⁰Any time a name is ~~struck out~~ in a list, this is indicated by striking out the page number in the column identifying their presence; for example: “~~37~~,” “~~54 tb~~,” or “~~74 2tr~~.”

²¹The “p” is included after the page number in the column for this date.

²²E.g., “I found the blessedness of mourning with them that mourn, even the penitents, whom we met this evening at the Foundry,” CW, MS Journal, Aug. 27, 1743 (MARC, DDCW 10/2, 2:177). See also JW’s description of penitents and their gatherings in Plain Account, VII, Works, 9:268–69.

²³When a name appears in a “penitent trial” band, this is indicated by adding “pb” after the page number in the relevant column.

²⁴See JW, Plain Account, II.5, Works, 9:260.

²⁵Rule 5 in the original Fetter Lane society was “That some one person in each band be desired to interrogate the rest in order, who may be called the leader of the band,” see WHS 17 (1929), 30. JW omitted this rule, and any mention of a “leader” of a band, in his Journal record (Works, 18:236) and the normative Dec. 25, 1738 list of “Rules of the Band Society” (Works, 9:77).

leader in regular bands as well. For each dated listing the various groupings (such as married men) are divided into bands containing 6–8 members. Listings over the first few months show a notable consistency in the name that appears first in these bands, and this person was often also a leader of a trial band. It is reasonable to assume that these persons served as a leader for the band, at least charged with facilitating the meeting. Starting in January 1744 Wesley began specifically designating a leader in each regular band.²⁶ Their role as leader of a regular band is reflected in the chart below.²⁷ Those appearing repeatedly as leader of a regular band could be considered core members of the Foundery society. An even stronger indicator of such status would be selection by Wesley to serve as a leader/mentor of the early trial bands. These persons appear in the main list below only in their role in the regular band of which they were a member (and often the leader), so I devote a separate chart after the main list to recording who served as leaders of trial bands, and how many trial bands they led (see pp. 58–59 below).

Another crucial quality that Wesley desired in those forming the core of the Foundery society was a commitment to move beyond simple assurance of saving faith, pressing toward Christian “perfection.” The Foundery Band Lists trace the emergence of a distinct accountability group for persons sharing this commitment. Pages 139–40 of the notebook (near the end and separated from prior material by two blank pages) contain a list of names dated December 25, 1743. No title is given the group of persons, nor are they explicitly divided by sex or marital status (comparison makes clear that married men are listed first, followed by single men, then married women, and finally single women). Page 141 contains a refined form of the list, dated July 1744, which is shorter but composed of persons who had appeared on the prior list. The separation of sex and marital status remains implicit in this second listing, but a title is now added: “Select Society.”²⁸ A roll of the select society dated October 1744 appears on pages 142–43, this time divided into the typical four lists divided by sex and marital status. With this new group now firmly established, listings of the select society for 1745–46 begin to appear earlier in the notebook, incorporated with the band lists of their respective dates. All persons in the select society on a particular date also appear in regular bands, so I provide a separate listing of members in the select society (pp. 60–65 below).

Two characteristics of the select society evident in Foundery Band Lists deserve mention. First, there is notable but not complete overlap between those whom Wesley entrusted as leaders of bands and those who participated in the select society. Consider, for example, the cumulative list of leaders of trial bands. Well over half of those serving this role between April 1742 and March 1743 appear in the initial December 1743 list of the select society—though this presence is uneven when one factors in sex and marital status, men appear less often. While 7 of 14 married men who led trial bands appear on the initial select society list, only 3 of 11 single men appear on the latter; by contrast, 8 of 18 single women overlap on the lists, and (taking one apparent death into account) all 22 of the married women appear in both settings.²⁹ This imbalance was no anomaly. Totals of the lists of the select society in Foundery Band Lists ²⁶Initially he wrote “Lr” after the name, which was usually but not always first on the list. Over the months he turned to writing the name of the band leader in vertically in the margin (as he had the leaders of trial bands).

²⁷In the list that follows a single asterisk (*) after the page number in a column indicates the person was the first name in their respective list and apparent leader of the group; after Jan. 1744 a double asterisk () is used to indicate the person was specifically designated leader.

²⁸See JW’s prosaic account of the emergence of the select society and how it operated in Plain Account, VIII.2, Works, 9:269–70.

²⁹Jane Jackson’s name appears in a regular band for married women and as leader of a trial band through Nov. 1742. But her name is struck out on the main band list and she never appears again. She was likely the Mrs. Jane Jackson buried Feb. 5, 1743 in Tower Hamlets, shortly before JW’s recording of new

While I have tried to incorporate the most significant general information that can be gleaned from Foundry Band Lists in this resource, it is not exhaustive. There is other information included vertically in the margins of the Foundry Band Lists—such as the day of the week and the time a group met, or which “division” (area) of London it represented—that I have not tried to capture. I have also ignored Wesley’s annotations when I could not discern with sufficient confidence their meaning. The place where this proved most challenging was the lists for November 1742 and March 1743 (pp. 33–63). On the majority of these pages Wesley placed markings in front of most name. In some cases it is a single dot, in others a double dot (like a colon), in yet others it is a single horizontal line, and in some the line is combined with a dot underneath; expanding the possibilities, sometimes Wesley pens instead the letter “a,” or this letter with a line over it, or what might be the letter “p.” These markings were likely Wesley’s way recording quickly his evaluation of the spiritual state of each person as he met with the bands. While access to their meaning is tantalizing, deciphering them is further complicated by the fact that Wesley may be using Byrom’s shorthand in most of the cases: where dots indicate different vowels depending on placement, a horizontal line indicates the letter “s” (or a word starting with that letter), and the apparent “p” would be the shorthand mark for “w” (or a word starting with that letter). Those who might wish to pursue this challenge further are referred to the notebook itself.

[While sections of the notebook are numbered, it is not numbered sequentially as a whole. It is also clear that some pages have been removed from the volume. As it survives, if one starts with the first page on which text/names appear and counts to the last page on which text/names appear, there are 145 pages (four of which are blank, scattered within the total). The summary that follows assigns page numbers accordingly.]
